Three Metaphysical Perspectives

The belief in the body/mind existing as an object in space goes unquestioned, as does the belief that the universe as a whole is made up of myriads of separate and distinct forms. There is the assumption that the senses and the mind are infallible and give one a perfectly clear view of things so the experienced reality is accepted as being just how one perceives it. The descriptions given to things thus perceived are also accepted under the same assumption.

The belief in the body/mind existing as an object in space goes unquestioned, as does the belief that the universe as a whole is made up of myriads of separate and distinct forms. There is some insight into the possibility that the senses and the mind may be somewhat limited and that this may limit one's ability to fully comprehend the true nature of that which is observed. However it is assumed that one's perception of and description of that which is observed is relatively accurate.

There is 'something' that inexplicably exists and forms a holistic field of existence within which there are no independent objects. The field has flow and regions of intensity. All things are eddies within the unified field of existence. Some regions are experienced as 'I' and some are experienced as 'objects' of perception. Some of these eddies are sensory experiences and thoughts, which depend on the structure of the mind, which channels the flow. Hence one may interpret things as 'objects' in space or as experiences stirred up by the field of existence, which can be conceived of as a non-material essence that induces experiences of material forms – such as in a virtual reality.
